Advertising ends in 2019 Visuals (coming soon) Development The name BIOMUTANT was chosen by the development team's manager and creative director Tobias Erna after the concept of post-apocalyptic story ideas came to mind for the game. Erna wanted a name that was somewhat difficult to pronounce and that was meant to be relatively unique. The name might be based on the real-life BIO-Chem-Mut-Antidote , and is considered a "mutant punk" video game. The concept of a post-apocalyptic setting inspired Erna, as it gave the game more freedom to do something new. The mutant / ex-mutant theme was also used to reflect the main character, who has a violent past and "mutates" when he reaches adulthood. The setting was inspired by . While in development, the team had trouble deciding on a combat system. After several failed attempts, they eventually decided to make Biomutant a melee-focused combat game. The team asked themselves "why shouldn't we be able to fight other mutants with our arms and fists?" as well as "why can't weapons be born out of scientific experimentation? What if we could build and program our weapons to function according to a specific biome?" The class system is based on the experimental philosophy proposed by French thinker Jean-Paul Sartre. While the game features real world influences, there are also several common fantasy elements, such as the fantasy notion of a map of the world with many biomes, different biome-influenced characters, and the notion of "artificial or magical objects" powering the world's various mechanics. However, the developers decided not to continue this trend. The team limited the fantasy elements to the backdrops of the world. Erna described the game as being inspired by the 80s and 90s American genre of post-apocalyptic role-playing games, such as Fallout and Wasteland. Biomutant takes inspiration from Kung-Fu movies such as Shaolin Monks (1986) and Danny vs. the Monster from Outer Space (1958), and also features many cultural references, including .
